ABOUT THE EVENT

Scientists often climb the leadership ladder through their scientific achievements and technical abilities. But few are prepared with the leadership skills necessary to develop and manage a best practice scientific team. To maximise performance in the laboratory and other settings, principal scientists must employ a number of skills including strong communication, EQ and authenticity.

Continuous funding cuts often cause tension and disengagement in the workplace. As a leader, it is imperative to motivate and engage your team in challenging circumstances, whilst addressing conflict simultaneously. To achieve an inspired and ambitious team, scientific leaders must create a work environment conducive to innovation and creativity.

Through various communication avenues and tactical relationship building, scientists can drive productivity and positive change whilst creating a strong supportive network for their team.

In this workshop, delegates will explore the leadership skills demanded of scientific professionals to increase team performance and fast-track research outcomes, in a real-time decision-making environment.

WHO WILL ATTEND?

- Principal Research Scientists
- ► Technical Leaders
- ► Senior Science Coordinators
- Research Managers
- ► Scientific Professors
- ► Scientific Project Managers
- ► Heads of Science

YOUR FACILITATOR

Martyn is a consultant, coach and facilitator with Continuum Consulting. He brings over 20 years' experience of working in and with central and local government combined with coaching, facilitation and training skills and practices. Prior to joining Continuum Consulting, Martyn worked as a Director at the Ministry for the Environment and with the Office of the Auditor General. He has extensive experience in the procurement of significant scientific input to both public policy development and projects delivery such as air quality standards, water quality standards, contaminated land clean-up operations, climate change and sustainability issues. He has worked through the "heat" of the debate from theory and research towards satisfactory implementation of public policy outcomes on many occasions with scientists, policy managers and politicians.

Martyn is an accredited Coach using brain based coaching methods and NeuroLeadership principles.
